Ambiguous Pronoun Reference

If two people or things are mentioned in a sentence, it is important for the reader to know whom or what a pronoun refers to. Otherwise, the pronoun is said to be ambiguous, which means it's unclear which noun the pronoun is replacing. A sentence with ambiguous pronouns should be rewritten so that its meaning is clear.

Ambiguous Pronoun Example

Unclear: Mrs. Brooks made an appointment for Savannah while she was at the dentist.

It is unclear whether she refers to Mrs. Brooks or to Savannah. In this sentence, she is an ambiguous pronoun

Clear: While Mrs. Brooks was at the dentist, she made an appointment for Savannah.

In this sentence, it is clear that she refers to Mrs. Brooks and not Savannah.

Our Story A Demonstrative pronoun is a pronoun that represents a noun and expresses its position so near or far (even in time). Demonstration pronouns are "this", "this", "these" and "those". Yours? Eat these tonight. Throw them away. Like all pronouns, demonstrative pronouns replace names or phrases of names. More precisely, a demonstrative pronoun is written into something that has previously been mentioned or is understood by the context (said earlier). Remember the lobster with the blue claw? Can I have it, please? (Here, "this" stands for something previously mentioned. The precedent of "this" is the phrase of the noun "lobster with blue claw.") This is delicious. (Here, the context tells us what "this" is. The precedent of "this" is "lobster" or "meal.") Do you remember two lobsters with claws? Can I have them, please? (The history of "those" is shown in bold.) These are delicious. (Remember that, with demonstrative pronouns, the precedent does not always appear in the next text. The precedent is often understood by the context surrounding the speaker.) The unique demonstrative pronouns "this" and "that" stand out for the singular things (for example, "lobster with blu e claw"). The plural demonstrative pronouns and "these" and "those" are able to indicate plural things (for example, "the two lobsters holding claws"). In addition to telling us whether your predecessor is singular or plural, a demonstrative pronoun also tells us whether your predecessor is close or distant. "This" and "those" are for distant things (for example, "lobsters in the tank"). "This" and "these" are played for close things (for example, "lobsters on the plate"). Paint this, but not that. Remove these but not those. (Demonstration pronouns are quite efficient. They tell us what, how many, and where. These two short sentences convey the following information: "Paint the wall near that I am But not the distant wall I'm indicating. Indicating. The image hooks I'm pointing to, but not those remote image hooks I'm pointing to.") Remember that the demonstrative pronouns stand for things. (Typically, you are waiting for a phrase of the name or an idea expressed previously.)"Modify the names, they are demonstrable deterrent In the four examples below, we have demonstration determinists that change the names (shown in bold) In the first four examples above, the demonstrative pronouns were present for these nouns. This idea is ridiculous. Is that your hike? Eat these crosswords tonight. Throw away those rolls. There are a couple of oddities with demonstrative pronouns. In the examples below, we do not know what "those" or "those" means until © We have not read the descriptions. (The descriptions (shown in bold) are called relative clauses.) Do not fear those who argue, but those who slip. What is unfair can really benefit no one; what is really can't harm anyone. Occasionally, the thing that the demonstrative pronoun represents comes after the demonstrative pronoun. When this happens, it is called "posture" (shown in bold). This is why every military officer will fight 191;189; so there can be peace. (Colombian President Juan Manuel Santos) (The President deliberately used the wrong order to emphasize. Anastrophe this technique is called.) The most common question of writing involving a proverb is a weak, ambiguous or non-existent ring to its predecessor (sometimes referred to as "defective pronoun reference"). Typically, the predecessor of a proverb is close to the previous text. In these two examples, the links with the predecessors (shown in bold) are not ambiguous. My case is not a trial. This is a lynching. Freedom means responsibility. This that most men fears it. fears. George Bernard Shaw) (All of the preceding sentence, i.e., the idea, is the background to "That.") You have to make sure the background to your demonstrative pronoun is clear. Let's imagine instead that George Bernard Shaw wrote this: Freedom means responsibility. This is what most men fear. (The background of "what" is the whole idea as before? Now it's less clear why the antecedent might be freedom or responsibility.) Here are some more examples with ambiguous backgrounds: Expect a Spanish police officer to check for a reflective jacket, a warning triangle, beam deflectors, a GB sticker and a set of lamps. spare parts, although these are no longer mandatory. (Now, it's pretty clear that the background to "these" is "a replacement set of light bulbs", but it could be the whole list.) The next recruit recruitment will receive four presentations on the new procedures. Their start is scheduled for mid-August. (The background of "these" is ambiguous. It could be "the recruits", "the presentations", or "the procedures".) Such ambiguity occurs because a writer knows what the antecedent is and assumes that others will identify it with the same clarity of thought. (Unfortunately, however, that clarity of thought does not always shine through words.) The problem most often occurs when a writer has expressed a multi-component idea and then begins a sentence with a word like "This means"1â2Â", "This explainsÂ" or "This is why"1â2.Â" If you find yourself starting a sentence with a pronoun proves Ask yourself a question such as "What does 1â2Â mean", "What explains 1â2Â", or "What does 1â2.Â" If you don't get the answer, you should consider a rewrite or a demonstrative determinator and a noun to spell it more clearly.. The next recruit recruitment will receive four presentations on the new procedures. The beginning of these It is scheduled for mid-August. (Now we have a demonstration determinant that changes the noun'presentations'. Key point If you start a sentence with a term like "This is 12nd" or "This suggests 12nd", make sure it is clear what your "This" or "That" refers to. Do a test on the proverbs What are the pronouns?
