There are a handful of cables that transmit audio and video signals. For years, coaxial video cables were one of the only choices to connect the video components. Coaxial video cables have that famous pin connector, sometimes called a Stinger, which can be pushed or screwed in place. Coaxial video cables are now predominantly confined to external connections, such as satellite TV or cable TV lines crossing the wall. A single coaxial cable carries both video and audio signals. HDMI cables are an updated version of DVI. The HDMI cables have also been designed for use with HD components, but their connector is much more subtle, like a large USB cable. HDMI also includes HDCP copy protection. HDMI cable producers tend to advertise their product as the only choice to connect HD video components, but it's not true. DVI cables work equally well. However, if you are using an analogue TV, all three work equally well [Source: Cobalt Cable]. In Europe and the UK, the most popular dual-purpose cable is called Scart (Syndicat des Constructeurs of RadiorÃ© Viseurs). SCART cables are equipped with 21-pin connectors. In Europe, Scart cables do the work of RCA analogue audio cables, as well as composite video cables, videos and components, but cannot transport video or digital bandwidth sound signals, such as those needed for high-definition TVs . HDMI is the favorite cable in Europe for HD components. FireWire, or IEEE 1394, cables are mostly associated with computer connection devices, but some high-end home theater receivers and HDTV are now equipped with FireWire ports. FireWire is able to carry MPEG-2 compressed videos and digital audio. You can use a FireWire cable to connect a digital video camera directly to the Home Theater system to show some unmodified movies. To summarize, here are the cables that would be used for some common domestic entertainment systems. Home Stereo System (CD Change, Stereo Receiver, Speakers): Fine: If you are playing regular CDs or MP3s, you will only need RCA analogue audio cables and speaker cable. Higher-end: If you want more fresh digital audio, go for coaxial or digital cables and more often speaker wire. Highest-end: If you want the DVD-Audio unparallelled sound in full surround sound, you will need special DVD-Audio cables and 12-gauge speaker wire. Home Theatrical System (Blu-ray Player, DVD Player or VCR, Video Game Console, Home Theater Receiver, TV, Speakers): Fine: If you have an old standard definition TV and more you use the system to watch regular DVDs or VHS tapes, then you will be fine with a composite video cable in bundles with RCA analogue audio cables. Higher-end: For a new standard TV, you should really update to video cables RCA cables will continue to work well for audio. Highest-end: Once the world of high definition is inserted, you will need to use both the video cables of the components and one of the two copy protected options: DVI or HDMI. You also want to invest inspeaker cable to make the most of your surround sound system.For more information about home audio and video systems, follow the links below.Related HowStuffWorks ArticlesCobalt Cable.
