We need to find out Researchers are studying existing hunter-gatherer tribes who, despite being skilled with their weapons, often struggle to obtain meat as a significant portion of their diet. Typically, these tribes rely on their wives to gather food, which provides only about one-third of their energy intake from meat. Studies suggest that the traditional diets of these tribes may not be entirely healthy due to their limited ability to digest a wide range of foods. The variation in global diets is evident in different cultures. For instance, Inuit people derive most of their calories from seal meat, while Jains are vegetarian but permit milk consumption. Other groups, like those who consume fish and insects, also exist. These differences have implications for the caveman diet, which was not uniform among ancient populations. However, adopting a caveman diet today poses several challenges. It can be expensive to obtain lean meat, and consuming too much red meat may have negative health consequences. Additionally, relying heavily on meat can be detrimental to one's health. Looking for help with your IELTS Listening Test? Practice with our free tests!
